SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA NATIONAL FORESTS LAND MANAGEMENT PLAN

Forest plan revisions for the four Southern California National Forests, Los Padres, Angeles, Cleveland and San Bernardino are in their 90 day public comment period.

These land management plans will effect forest wide land use over the next 10 to 15 years.

There are 6 alternative plans proposed. Some of the alternatives are:

- No change
- Strong protection of all forest resources
- Increase in recreation opportunities
- Increased motorized access in the backcountry with emphasis on expanding forest resource development.

You have an opportunity to comment and make your preferences known. The plans can be reviewed and comments made at www.fs.fed.us/r5/scfpr. The last day comments will be accepted is Wednesday, August 11, 2004.

WHY SNAKES DEVELOPED RATTLES

Rattlesnakes belong to the family Viperidae, or vipers, the most advanced family of reptiles in the world.

On the high plains of North America, at the dawn of the Pliocene epoch between 4 and 12 million years ago, rattlesnakes differentiated from their more generally adapted viperid ancestors by developing rattles.

The reason for this development was that during the early stages of rattlesnake evolution, the interior grasslands were crowded with vast herds of ancient horses, camels, and pronghorn antelope that moved together in animal rivers across the prairie. At this time most vipers and many species of nonpoisonous snakes vibrated the tips of their tails to produce a rattle against dry leaves to avoid being stepped on. Rattlesnakes, which evolved in this sea of cloven hooves, improved this protective technique by developing resonators on the ends of their tails to amplify this vibratory noise.

THE PRIVATEER
ANDRE-PAUL “HIPOLITO” DE BOUCHARD

During the days of sailing ships it was common for monarchs to license pirates to prey on ships and the people of other nations. Naturally, part of the bargain was that part of their ill-gotten gain would go to the sponsoring monarch and country. It was typical that such pirates also had other investors. Sponsorship by a monarch or country was rather like raising a private navy to strengthen the position of the sponsoring monarch and nation. The license, or its equivalent, provided a degree of legitimacy to the undertaking. It also meant that predation would be limited by the license, so the pirate could put in at ports of other nations without fear of being unwelcome. Reprovisioning was an absolute necessity during the tall ship era.

Perhaps the most famous of the privateers was Francis Drake. He managed to capture the annual Spanish treasure ship from Peru, circumnavigate the world and make himself, his crew, the Queen of England and his investors rich. Indeed, the value of his treasure rivaled the gross national product of England for the year he returned, rendered him famous – to this day – earned him a knighthood, and made him everyone’s, at least in England, favorite mariner.

Andre-Paul “Hipolito” de Bouchard, a Frenchman, who threw in with the Argentina, set out during the second decade of the 19th Century to plunder Spanish shipping and possessions. To do this, he had two ships, his flagship the Argentina and the Santa Rosa, and 350 cutthroats. By the time he got to the Sandwich Islands, i.e., Hawaii, he had already captured 26 Spanish ships.

In Hawaii, he plotted to raid Monterey, the colonial capital of California. However, a spy informed the California authorities, who made plans to defend these shores. The Californios raised a force of 200, 150 of which were Indian bowmen. The force was divided between Monterey and Santa Barbara. Needless to say, the Spanish residents of California panicked. People fled inland. From San Buenaventura, some took up residence in Simi. People buried their valuables and lookouts took up residence along the coastline of the thinly populated colony.

Flying the Argentine flag, Bouchard set sail for California, arriving in Monterey during a moonless night in November 1818. At first light, the Santa Rosa opened fire, but was badly damaged by shore batteries. The Santa Rosa’s crew swam to the Argentina under cover of night, leaving the injured aboard the Santa Rosa. Bouchard sent a letter to the governor demanding a surrender. The governor rejected his demand and the Argentina subsequently opened fire with its 40 guns and sent 300 pirates to invade the city. The Spanish were outnumbered and outgunned. They fled the City, leaving only inmates of the jail behind. Bouchard’s men captured one of those prisoners – the town drunk. They sacked the city, burning many buildings. No treasure was found, except for a fine cache of wine and brandy, of which Bouchard’s men made good use. The Santa Rosa was repaired and both ships sailed south to Rugio along the Santa Barbara coast. A large group of horsemen met the pirates and captured three of them. Bouchard sacked Rancho del Refugio, burning its buildings, cutting down fruit trees and cutting the throats of the horses they could find.

Bouchard sailed on to Santa Barbara. There, during a heavy rain, the 30-man garrison of the presidio marched around and around a small knoll near the beach, changing clothes each time they disappeared behind the knoll. Bouchard formed the opinion that the garrison was at least 300 men strong. He called a truce and exchanged his one prisoner – the Monterey town drunk – for the three pirates. He then sailed south, stopping briefly to march inland to sack Mission San Juan Capistrano. So much for respect for the church. California had seen the last of Hipolito de Bouchard.

Of some note, two pirates jumped ship near Santa Barbara. One was Joe Fisher, the first black American in California. He gained some respect and the friendship of at least one powerful Californio. The other was Joseph Chapman, a native of Boston, may have been shanghaied by Bouchard in Hawaii. Chapman became a respected engineer and builder, was pardoned by the King of Spain, and eventually married the daughter of Don Jose Maria Ortega, the owner of Rancho del Refugio, which Chapman had helped sack.

ORIGINAL AD FOR SIMI VALLEY REAL ESTATE

Our lives are awash with real estate ads. Some are for single family detached homes; some are for residential tract homes; and others are for those “20.13 acres available – will build to suit”. All real estate ads describe the merits of the offered property in the most glowing terms. I can just imagine what the Philistines said to their followers to get them to pick up their possessions and families and sail off to Canaan during the Twelfth Century B.C. The Romans must have said the same things - and so on.

What follows is that first ad for land in the Simi. The date seems to be 1886.

MOUNT PINOS - SHEEP CAMP BACKPACK

The Trail Blazers held an overnight backpack trip in the Las Padres National Forest on May 22-23. The seven backpackers who participated were Phil Ankrom, Ursula Christie, Martin DeGoey, Jodene Downey, Margarita Marsh, Louise Pomes and John Sabol. Two regulars missed the backpack - Arlene Altshuler because of a broken ankle and Mike Kuhn due to an intestinal flu.

We met at 7:00 AM Saturday and headed up I-5 to Frazier Park in two vehicles. We took a short break at the Frazier Park Jack-in-the-Box and headed up to Mount Pinos. After a winding drive up, we reached the large paved parking lot at the top.

We all got our gear together and headed out for the 5-mile pack into camp. The morning was clear and cool as we made our way up the road to the 8831 foot peak and then down switchbacks towards Sawmill Mountain. On the way in we met Mike Kuhn's son Dave and 4 members of his group. Then some steep climbing until the 4 1/2 mile point where we dropped down into the Sheep Camp Campground.

All three campground areas were empty, so our group took the first campground. Dave's group followed a short time later and settled into the second campground. Everyone setup their tents and then sat around eating a light lunch and enjoying the scenery.

About this time, down the trail came 25 Boy Scouts and 4 - 6 leaders. There wasn't enough room for all of them in the remaining campsites so we shared our site with some of the older scouts and two of their leaders. The rest spread out in the remaining two campsites.

After lunch we relaxed, filtered water and gathered firewood. We relaxed and some took a nap. Soon it was time for dinner. The wind picked up and the temperature dropped. I was glad I had brought a down jacket. By about 8:00PM most of us had turned in to our sleeping bags. The last people awake carefully doused the campfire.

The wind howled most of the night but as a result the temperature didn't drop as much as it could have. In the morning, several early risers got the fire going and soon everyone was up and had the stoves heating water for cereal and coffee.

The morning was beautiful and after a leisurely breakfast we took down tents, packed gear and prepared to leave. Again the campfire was doused and the camp was policed. We packed out all our trash and some left by previous campers.

At this point we split into two groups. Three of us hiked out the way we had come in and the remaining four headed down trail for a 7 mile hike ending in the Three Falls Boy Scout Camp. Our two drivers then drove down the mountain and picked up the four downhill hikers.

We again stopped at the Jack-in-the-Box in Frazier Park for a well-deserved lunch, and then headed back to Simi Valley. A good time was had by all.

CHUMASH BELIEFS AND THEIR EVERYDAY WORLD

From Hudson and Blackburn, The Material Culture of the Chumash Interaction Sphere (1982), page 26:

“...every item made or used by the Chumash was more than just an inanimate, physical object – it usually had a supernatural dimension as well. We do not know whether a spirit was felt to be present within a lump of raw material or was imparted to it by the artisan who selected and shaped it, or both, but it is evident in many comments in Harrington's notes that material objects were conceived of as having supernatural powers in their own rights.”
